The Loss of the Commodore.

A passenger on the ill-fated steamer Commodore, which was wrecked on her last voyage from New York to St. Louis, gives a thrilling account of the circumstances.

Beyond New Haven, the wind began to blow in a terrific manner, attacking the ship with terrible fury, rendering her utterly unmanageable. In a few moments she refused to obey her helm, and could not by any means be kept on her course. She was completely at the mercy of the winds and waves, which played with her for a short time as if she were but a feather on the surface of the water. Soon the trying increase of the waves, when one breaker succeeded in striking her all before, struck her with terrible violence, "stove in" her bow and washed the forward decks quite clean. Her smoke-stacks next went by the board, and the din and confusion caused by this accident and the noise of the breaking of furniture, the crashing of lamps, tables and almost every movable article in the saloon hall, state-rooms and cabin, was only exceeded when it was announced that the steamer was sinking over and that there was every danger of fire.

Many who before remained comparatively cool and quiet now became intensely excited, and the thought that the most destructive of all the elements had conspired to cause their total destruction took from them most of the intrepidity which so distinguished their behavior before—

It was a trying moment, indeed—the wind coming with their utmost, the snow falling in thick and dampening flakes, to be frozen immediately by the piercing wintry frost, which with all the attendant dangers was enough to chill and stun their spirits, and the most courageous spirit and to add to these fearful trials came the cry of fire, and then the moment came which would shake the noblest and the strongest of all on board, who, after the greatest exertions, succeeded in subduing the flames, which, with all the danger and terror they inspired, were almost preferable to the gloomy darkness which followed. The stoves were upset, the fires put out, the lamps smashed and the lights completely extinguished, and then in the darkness of a cold and stormy night the Commodore was left to be played with by a most fearful and merciless gale, and in this way did the unfortunate vessel continue for two hours, until one o'clock in the morning, during which period she was before stated, completely submerged, and all on board expecting her at each moment to go down.

The deck hands, whose duty it was, and for which they were paid, to attend to the comfort and guard the safety of the passengers, were not only the most useless in the hour of need, but their conduct added materially to the danger of the vessel and the terror of those on board. Almost from the first moment many of these men went to their berths and rolled themselves in their blankets, and left the vessel to her fate—

When the pumps had to be worked and other courses taken for her safety they refused to work unless they were paid. When paid by several of the passengers. One gentleman gave him last $20 to go on, and another refused $5 to say "there was no use in working now." Another party procured in some portion of the vessel a jug of whisky, brought it on deck, and had a noisy and uproarious occasion; and one of them became so unmanageable that Lieut. Noyse, U. S.

Navy, had to bind him up to prevent his causing further damage. This, as may well be supposed, had a most demoralizing effect upon the passengers, who, in the hour of need, lost that support on which they counted, and which, except in the case of more than three hundred, they would have been sure to receive. The work at the pumps and elsewhere throughout the ship was mainly performed by the passengers, many of the women included, who rendered services of no mean importance.

For more than two weary hours, during which none but those who have gone through the ordeal can imagine the feelings of the people on board, the vessel drifted in the mercy of the waves, the captain and pilots being successful only in keeping the ship head on nearly south, and as the flood tide at this time was setting toward the Long Island shore—the wind still continuing in the opposite direction—their efforts were entirely directed to running the ship ashore on Long Island, and about 2 o'clock p. m.

were crowned with success by their striking on

New Orleans, Jan. 10.

A letter from General Beauregard to William C. King, editor of the Times, will appear to-morrow morning, referring to statements published in Northern papers about his position on national questions. General Beauregard did not intend to make a speech at Canton, but he did in a private conversation that the South had defended what it considered their rights, and having appealed to the arbitration of arms, he had no choice but to accept the Constitution as made by war and understood by the Supreme Court. Regarding the Confidential Amendment, he said he had no interest in it, except through the papers, to ascertain the public sentiment, but he had no intention of accepting the Amendment as made by war and undoubtedly by the Supreme Court. He said he was at the mercy of the North, but he would never do anything which his honor would not approve, should protect its interests, and, lastly, he would use the words "Confidential National Government," meaning a common, Federal National Government, depending under the Constitution as it is understood by the Supreme Court.
